Jesus and the six objectives of Daniel 9:24

Although Daniel 9:24–27 addresses the Antiochene crisis of the second century BCE, many of Jesus’ followers have read this passage with reference to his first and second comings. Following the typological example of the Old Testament and New Testament, this article considers how Jesus is another anointed one that replays the 6th and 2nd century worlds of Daniel 9 and thereby accomplishes the six objectives of Daniel 9:24.

Introduction

The New Testament never explicitly cites Daniel 9:24–27 to say that Jesus fulfils the prophecy of the seventy sevens. This author (Ulrich 2014:1062–1083) has previously considered the meaning of this prophecy, including the six objectives of verse 24, for the Antiochene crisis of the second century and early Judaism afterwards.¹ That crisis consisted of the tyranny of Antiochus IV, the compromises of Hellenistic Jews for economic benefits, and the murder of a legitimate high priest (Onias III). In the structure and details of the seventy sevens or ten jubilee cycles, Jewish readers (e.g. 1 Macc 1:54) first saw a typological relationship between 6th and 2nd century instances of human evil on the one hand and God’s preservation of his people’s inheritance on the other. By the end of the 1st century CE, Josephus (A.J. 10.11.7 §§275–276) recognised parallels between the Antiochene and Roman desecrations of the Jerusalem temple and considered them instances of Daniel’s abomination of desolation (Dn 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). The history of God’s relationship with the Jews featured recapitulation of judgement and blessing.²

Not to be overlooked is that Jesus, before Josephus began to write, had already anticipated the Roman destruction of the Jerusalem temple and reinterpreted Daniel’s abomination of desolation in view of it (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; Lk 21:20). The Gospels, however, never say that Jesus identified himself with the cut off anointed one of Daniel 9:26. He did not claim to be, and the Gospel writers did not portray him as, a second Onias III. Instead, the writer of Hebrews likened Jesus in his priestly role to Melchizedek (Heb 5:10). Even so, many of Jesus’ followers have read Daniel 9:24–27 with reference to his first and second comings.³ Whether they silently ignore or explicitly deny the interest of Daniel 9 (along with Daniel 8 and 11) in the Antiochene crisis, they identify Jesus as the cut-off anointed one of Daniel 9:26. In death, he is thought to have read Daniel 9:24–27 with reference to his first and second comings.

How Jesus participates in Daniel’s typology

Unlike the Babylonian exile of the 6th century, the Antiochene crisis of the second century did not involve deportation. Nevertheless, faithful Jews in Judea during the second century could feel alienated from their land because someone else (the Seleucids or compromised Jewish leaders) controlled Judea and them. Jubilee may represent a return to the land from which one had been estranged, but living in the land did not necessarily constitute jubilee. God’s people also longed to be independent and faithful in their land. A Hellenised Jewish leader who disregarded God’s law (cf. 1 Macc 1:11–15; 2 Macc 4:7–16, 5:6) was no better or preferable than a Seleucid ruler who persecuted those who kept the law (1 Macc 1:41–50; 2 Macc 5:25–26). Under either of them, the alienation persisted, and jubilee (i.e. the restoration of lost inheritance) remained an ideal.

For this reason, a 6th century narrative world in Daniel (and for some readers, a 6th century real world) and a 2nd century real world can be typologically related. In both cases, leaders failed to perform their duties with a concern for God’s honor and God’s people. Consequently, many of God’s people lost sight of their identity and mission and became unrighteous. Jesus encountered a similar situation – irresponsible leaders and wayward people – during his ministry. For this reason, he, after cleansing the temple (Mt 21:12–13; Mk 11:15–16; Lk 19:45–46; cf. 1 Macc 4:41–43), applied the term abomination of desolation to events of his day and beyond (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; Lk 21:20). He read Daniel typologically and saw in his day a repetition of the pattern of unbelief and worldliness that the writer of Daniel had applied to Hellenistic Jews during the reign of Antiochus IV (France 2007:911–912; Hagner 1995:700; Vos 1986:95; Wright 1996:351). The Roman invasion and siege of Jerusalem confirmed his insight.

Wright (1996:493) says, ‘Jesus’ symbolic actions [at the temple] inevitably invoked this entire wider context [of the Maccabean response to Antiochus IV]. Jesus was performing Maccabean actions, albeit with some radical differences.’ He may not have made literal war when he cleansed the temple, but the Antiochene crisis included the murder of a high priest that Jesus eventually replayed. Whatever differences there may be between them, Onias III and Jesus shared unjust suffering and death at the hands of unrighteous sons of Abraham.

Unlike the writer of Hebrews, Matthew may not call Jesus a priest, but Matthew makes a point of explaining the redemptive significance of Jesus’ name (Mt 1:21). He then presents Jesus as the one who can forgive sin (Mt 9:2) because he, by dying on a cross, paid the penalty for sin (Mt 20:28). Jesus was the definitive priest because he offered himself as the atoning substitute. In so doing, Jesus was involved in a war that others brought to him and that he took to them. This war that began long before his death involved stripping the spiritual forces of evil of their power to captivate people in rebellion – an outcome that his exorcisms had foreshadowed (Meyer 1979:155–156; Ridderbos 1962:61–64; Tannehill 1986:88–89). Jesus further conquered the power of sin not by destroying the sinners but by absorbing the punishment for their sins. Because his righteous and unjust suffering became vicariously redemptive, he, indeed, lived up to the meaning that the angel had assigned to his name (Mt 1:21). He saved his people from their sin and reconciled them to God.

Daniel 9:26 forecasts trouble and deprivation for the second anointed one of the seventy sevens, and both certainly found their way to Onias III whose brother, Jason, unlawfully paid Antiochus IV for the office of high priest that Onias III legitimately held (2 Macc 4:7–10; 4 Macc. 4:17). Later, Menelaus unlawfully supplanted Jason and murdered Onias III (2 Macc 4:23–34). Something similar can be said about Jesus. Herod the Great tried to kill Jesus in infancy, and the trouble only continued after that. The Jewish religious leaders debated Jesus and tried to trap him with his words so that they could kill him. Jesus, however, was not surprised by the opposition. In fact, he seemed to initiate it by his supposedly blasphemous claims and upsetting activities – both of which challenged the entrenched power of the religious establishment. Saying that he came to bring a sword instead of peace, he certainly divided families, neighbours, and patriots over his identity (Mt 10:34–35). In some sense, he caused the trouble that eventually put him on the cross. Moreover, Jesus even announced his death. No sooner had Peter called Jesus the anointed one than Jesus predicted his impending suffering and death at the hands of Jewish religious leaders (Mt 16:21). Sure enough, they eventually succeeded in having him executed. The anointed one was cut off, seemingly with nothing. In fact, he never seemed to have much. Whilst alive, the anointed one had no place of sleeping to call his own (Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58). When he died, his friends deserted him out of fear of being guilty by association (Mt 26:56; Mk 14:50), and the Roman soldiers cast lots for his clothes that they had taken away from him (Mt 27:35; Mk 15:24; Lk 23:34; Jn 19:23). After being cut off, which can entail exclusion and/or extermination (and both happened to Jesus outside Jerusalem), Jesus was buried in someone else’s tomb (Mt 27:60). Maybe the worst of all, He had even been disowned by God (Mt 27:46).

At first glance, Jesus did not look like an anointed one who would accomplish the six objectives of Daniel 9:24 and thereby answer Daniel’s prayer about mercy for Israel and glory for God (9:17–19). His sinless life surely did not go unnoticed by his contemporaries, but his humble beginnings hardly aroused expectations of royal destiny or priestly intercession. His tendency not to call himself an anointed one further made him an unlikely messianic figure. Moreover, he seemed to come to a tragic end like Onias III and so never realised the hopes that others had for him. Even so, all of this trouble was God’s means of inaugurating his kingdom of redemption (cf. Mt 11:12; 20:28), and the Gospels suggest that Jesus spent most of his life intentionally looking ahead to his death. By his death, Jesus became greater than Onias III. This observation brings the six objectives of the seventy sevens into view.

How Jesus achieved the six objectives of Daniel 2:24

Whilst it is true that the New Testament never explicitly cites Daniel 9:24, explicit quotations are not the only way that the writers of the New Testament interacted with the Old Testament. Its categories of thought almost unconsciously shaped their view of the world and especially their view of Jesus. This was certainly true of the book of Daniel (cf. Evans 2002:521; Pennington 2009:286; Wright 1996:598). When Jesus called himself the Son of Man, he did not have to mention Daniel by name as the source of the title. Everybody knew what text was in view. The same could be said about the six objectives of Daniel 9:24. Sin, atonement, righteousness, fulfillment of prophecy, and temple were woven into the fabric of the New Testament world. After Jesus’ hermeneutics lesson on Easter Sunday (Lk 24:25–27, 44–47), the New Testament writers instinctively related these topics to the person and work of Jesus.

The first three objectives

Because the first three objectives concern the problem of sin, they can be grouped together here. It is hardly controversial to say that the New Testament considers the death of Jesus the definitive solution to sin. The New Testament begins with an angelic explanation of Jesus’ name in terms of salvation from sin (Mt 1:21), and then the first four books devote considerable attention to narrating Jesus’ death. Jesus in Matthew 20:28 and Mark 10:45 describes his impending death as a ransom for many. By calling himself the good shepherd in John 10:11, Jesus says that he willingly lays down his life for the sheep. He later announces in John 12:23, ‘The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified’ in death. When these passages and others are read with recollection of the meaning of Jesus’ name, it is evident that Jesus was aware of the atoning purpose of his first coming. The rest of the New Testament agrees with Jesus’ self-evaluation (e.g. Ac 13:38; Gl 1:4; Tt 2:14; Heb 9:15, 28; 1 Pt 2:24 3:18; 1 Jn 2:2 4:10; Rv 5:9).

Daniel 9:26 may not specifically say that the anointed one’s death atoned for sin. Even so, one is not being unreasonable to ask why the death of the second anointed one is mentioned if it has nothing to do with the accomplishing of the six objectives, especially the first three. Moreover, Daniel’s prayer implores God to provide a merciful solution to the sins of his people, and the first three objectives of the seventy sevens indicate that God wills to do so. In this atoning context, Gabriel then informs Daniel that an anointed one will be cut off. Meanwhile, Daniel has been reading the book of Jeremiah, which expects an anointed king of exceptional righteousness. This king’s reign will be accompanied by the priestly performance of atoning sacrifice (Jr 33:18). Daniel has also handled visions (Nebuchadnezzar’s and his) that announce the conquest of human evil by a coming kingdom and king. Furthermore, Daniel and his companions have experienced suffering because of their commitment to the God of Israel, and the God of Israel has used this suffering as a witness to Gentile kings and others. In other words, the Old Testament’s pattern of righteous and redemptive suffering occurs in the book of Daniel. So then, linking the death of the anointed one in Daniel 9:26 with the realisation of the six objectives in Daniel 9:24 hardly strain the grammatical-historical method of interpretation.

Jesus taught his disciples to read the Old Testament in view of God’s program of redemption that reaches its climax in his person and work (Lk 24:26–27, 44–47). The New Testament writers did just this. They may not cite every Old Testament verse and explain how it is fulfilled in Jesus. Instead, they assumed that their readers knew Jesus’ hermeneutic, could understand their Christ-centred reading of the Old Testament, and could handle the rest of the Old Testament in a similar way on their own. If associating the anointed one in Daniel 9:26 with the six objectives in Daniel 9:24, especially the first three, makes good hermeneutical sense without Jesus’ lesson in Luke 24, that association by generations of Christians after Jesus’ Easter teaching is certainly understandable. God uses his anointed ones, especially Jesus the antitype of redemptive suffering, to address the problem of sin.

The New Testament further explains how God answered the two requests of Daniel’s prayer: mercy for Israel and glory for God. Firstly, God in Jesus treated his people mercifully by providing atonement at great cost to himself. In so doing, he diverted his wrath onto Jesus who absorbed it along with sin’s just penalty. A righteous God propitiated his righteous anger and expiated the consequence of sin without destroying the sinners (Dn 9:16). Secondly, God brought glory to his name through his chosen means of redemption that climaxed at the cross of Jesus. Humans might not pursue glory through redemptive suffering, but Daniel’s God is great and awesome (Dn 9:4). He exists in a league by himself and answers prayers in ways that exceed human expectation. Humans can only marvel at ‘the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God’ (Rm 11:33) that regenerates through death.

The fourth objective

The fourth objective promises everlasting righteousness. Daniel’s prayer of confession, which was prompted by his reading of Jeremiah, acknowledges in Daniel 9:7 that God is righteous (יָדָע) and that his people, in effect, are unrighteous (Dn 9:18). In fact, they are covered with shame because of their willful violations of God’s commands. Those commands are part of God’s covenant that He made with Israel through Moses (Dn 9:4–15). This covenant may have provided the standard of righteous conduct for a people already redeemed by putting their faith in the blood of the Passover lamb; nevertheless, it did not have the power of regeneration within it (Baker 2010:74; Ridderbos 1975:153; Williams 2005:151; Wright 2004:27–29, 52–54, 64–65). The blood of animals can neither atone for sin nor change the heart (Heb 10:1–4). Instead, the blood of the Passover lamb typologically anticipated the blood of the Lamb of God that efficaciously takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1:29; 1 Cor 5:7). The power to transform the heart belongs exclusively to Jeremiah’s new covenant in Jesus’ blood (Lk 22:20; Jn 1:17), and Old Testament saints experienced that power prophetically by believing God’s promise regarding the blood of animal sacrifices.

Calvin (1981), as seen in his comments on Jeremiah 31:33, recognised this truth. He said:

the Fathers [Old Testament saints], who were formerly regenerated, obtained this favor through Christ, so that we may say, that it was as it were transferred to them from another source. The power, then, to penetrate into the heart was not inherent in the law, but it was a benefit transferred to the law from the Gospel. (p. 131)

God’s grace comes ultimately through Jesus the anointed one. Only the Spirit of Jesus can apply the benefits of Jesus’ active and passive obedience to believers and thereby regenerate and transform their hearts. From a historical point of view, Old Testament saints experienced this work of Jesus’ Spirit prophetically, and New Testament saints receive it retrospectively.

Transforming grace is the basis for everlasting righteousness. Because Jesus kept the law of God without infraction, He is the righteous one who can satisfy the justice of God by paying sin’s penalty. The resurrection proves God’s acceptance of Jesus’ work. Not only does the resurrection vindicate Jesus as the Righteous One (Ac 2:24, 33; Rm 1:4; 1 Tm 3:16) but it also makes it possible for Him to share His righteousness with those who believe in Him (Beale 2011:253–254, 262–263, 473–477, 493–498, 575–588; Gaffin 1987:89–92, 114–117, 120–129; Vos 1980:107, 109–114; Vos 1986:151). The Spirit of Jesus graciously applies the righteousness of Jesus to believers so that they become positionally and progressively conformed to His likeness through justification, sanctification, and glorification. As they reflect His righteousness in character and conduct, righteousness spreads throughout their areas of influence. Stated differently, the kingdom of God advances on earth as God’s people exhibit the righteousness of Jesus that the Spirit of Jesus imputes to and grows in them.

The Mosaic covenant had to do with the sanctification and mission of an already redeemed people. It told them how to live righteously in response to God’s preliminary and anticipatory provision of redemption in the Exodus. As seen, for example in Paul’s association of the law with love (Rm 13:8–10), the Mosaic instruction continues to have the same influence. Matthew 4:17 (a parallel verse) and other verses in Matthew clearly show that the third kingdom will rule over all the earth. None of the other kingdoms follow his. Moreover, verse 38 limits Nebuchadnezzar’s rule to humans, beasts, and birds – creatures that dwell on earth. Verse 39 even explicitly says that the third kingdom will rule over all the earth. None of the four kingdoms, however, rules over heaven. So then, Daniel 2 contrasts the human kingdoms of earth and God’s kingdom of heaven (Pennington 2009:272). That focus is especially seen in Matthew’s preference for the phrase kingdom of heaven instead of kingdom of God. Mark 1:15 reports that Jesus began his ministry during the Roman Empire by proclaiming, ‘The time has come; the kingdom of God is at hand’. Curiously, Matthew 4:17 (a parallel verse) and other verses in Matthew refer to the kingdom of God as the kingdom of heaven. According to Pennington (2009:289–290, 320–321), the writer of Matthew did not use a ‘reverential circumlocution’ to avoid direct reference to God (as was done in the literature of the Second Temple Judaism) but, instead, applied to Jesus the contrast in Daniel 2 between the human kingdoms of earth and the divine kingdom of heaven. This contrast involves not only ontology (Jesus in contrast to the kings in Daniel 2 is more than human) but also ethics (Jesus’ reign is characterised by righteousness). Pennington (2009:209)

Jesus who kept the law in order to perform Israel’s priestly mission, enables his people to keep it for a similarly priestly (i.e., evangelistic) purpose (cf. 1 Pt 2:9–3:17). If Daniel’s reading of Jeremiah’s recalls the new covenant that makes righteousness possible through the internalisation of God’s law, Jeremiah also expected a future king named Yahweh Is Our Righteousness (Jr 23:5–6; 33:15–16). This descendant of David would act righteously and establish righteousness. No such king appeared after Jeremiah’s ministry until Jesus, and certainly Jehoiakim, the only Davidic descendant mentioned in Daniel, failed to exemplify righteousness (cf. Jr 22:13–19). By identifying Jesus the anointed one as the son of David, the first verse of the New Testament signals that King Yahweh Is Our Righteousness has arrived. Through him, God fully answered Daniel’s prayer by turning away his anger in accordance with his righteousness (Dn 9:16). Jesus the righteous king saved his people from divine judgement by living sinlessly, paying sin’s penalty, and breaking sin’s power. He defeated their enemies – internal and external, earthly and spiritual, human and demonic, seen and unseen. Jesus also claimed to be Daniel’s Son of man who is said to receive dominion, majesty, and a kingdom (Dn 7:13–14). As such, Jesus inherited and realised the royal commission given to Adam, the first human (Gn 1:28), and later to the Davidic kings (Ps 72). He rules righteously over the creation for God’s glory, the benefit of God’s people, and the good of God’s other creatures.

One other point should be made in connection with the fourth objective. Daniel 2:37 says that the God of heaven gives dominion to Nebuchadnezzar, but not forever. Three other kingdoms follow his. Moreover, verse 38 limits Nebuchadnezzar’s rule to humans, beasts, and birds – creatures that dwell on earth. Verse 39 even explicitly says that the third kingdom will rule over all the earth. None of the four kingdoms, however, rules over heaven. So then, Daniel 2 contrasts the human kingdoms of earth and God’s kingdom of heaven (Pennington 2009:272). That focus is especially seen in Matthew’s preference for the phrase kingdom of heaven instead of kingdom of God. Mark 1:15 reports that Jesus began his ministry during the Roman Empire by proclaiming, ‘The time has come; the kingdom of God is at hand’. Curiously, Matthew 4:17 (a parallel verse) and other verses in Matthew refer to the kingdom of God as the kingdom of heaven. According to Pennington (2009:289–290, 320–321), the writer of Matthew did not use a ‘reverential circumlocution’ to avoid direct reference to God (as was done in the literature of the Second Temple Judaism) but, instead, applied to Jesus the contrast in Daniel 2 between the human kingdoms of earth and the divine kingdom of heaven. This contrast involves not only ontology (Jesus in contrast to the kings in Daniel 2 is more than human) but also ethics (Jesus’ reign is characterised by righteousness). Pennington (2009:209) says, ‘He [Matthew] is crafting a sharp distinction between two realms: one represented by the earthly world and its unrighteous inhabitants and the other by God’, who, of course, embodies righteousness and sends his eternal Son in human dress. The Son in his deity shares the attribute of righteousness and then reflects it as the image of God in his humanity. Each person, then, must make a decision about serving one of two possible masters (Mt 6:24), and the outcomes in terms of conduct and consequences could not be starker.

At this point, it is hard not to think that Matthew’s contrast between heaven and earth constitutes his way of distinguishing between the two ages that characterise New Testament eschatology as a whole (e.g. Gl 1:4). Although Pennington (2009:334) prefers to speak of two realms – an earthly realm (characterised by disobedience to God’s commands) and a heavenly realm (characterised by willing submission to King Jesus) that remain in tension until the eschaton – he recognises that Matthew is aware of moral duality (good versus evil) and eschatological duality (this age and the age to come). Whereas human kingdoms represent this present evil age that lives without reference to God and so suffers the deleterious consequences of unrighteous thought and conduct, the kingdom of heaven has to do with the age to come that interrupts into this present evil age through the person and work of God’s incarnate Son. These two incompatible ages run concurrently between the first and second comings of Jesus until God’s kingdom and king overthrow the evil regimes of human history and cause righteousness to prevail in human hearts and upon the earth – the fourth objective of Daniel 9:24.

The fifth objective

The seventy sevens disclose what God will do in the future in order to answer Daniel’s twofold prayer for mercy for Israel and glory for God. Stated differently, the seventy sevens announce God’s promises and state his intention to fulfill those promises. Sealing prophetic vision, which is the fifth objective, has to do with promise and fulfilment. Promise and fulfilment assume God’s continued activity in history to work out his plan of redemption. Gabriel assures Daniel that God’s purpose for his people did not end in exile. God still has more in store for them, and he will finish what he has announced. The seventy sevens, of course, do not constitute the first promise of God in the Old Testament. By the time that Gabriel appeared to Daniel, Yahweh already had an established track record of announcing his intention and then performing his word. Still, the Old Testament ends with an incomplete story and some promises unfulfilled.

Not surprisingly, then, the New Testament opens with Matthew’s announcements of fulfilment. Whilst some of his Old Testament citations were not predictions in their Old Testament context, Matthew considered the whole Old Testament the beginning of God’s story that foreshadows the climax and consummation in the person and work of Jesus (cf. France 2007:11; Wright 1992:63). Matthew was not alone in reading the beginning of the story in view of the end, for other disciples heard Jesus’ hermeneutics lesson on Easter Sunday (Lk 24:25–27, 44–47). Jesus changed the way that they read the Old Testament. They realised that the Spirit who inspired the prophets was talking about something or someone that the prophets could not fully comprehend at the time (1 Pt 1:10–12). The authors of the New Testament drew the strands of Old Testament theology together so that they converged on Jesus, as God had intended. Jesus fit the pattern that the Old Testament introduced and developed. He was the climax and fulfilment of God’s eternal plan.

Daniel 9:24 is not the only reference to sealing in Daniel. Daniel is also told to seal a vision (Dn 8:26) and a book (Dn 12:4) until the time of the end. The contents of both are a mystery that only Jesus, according to the New Testament, can disclose. As both the message and the messenger of God, Jesus came in the fullness of time to inaugurate God’s kingdom of redemption. He alone, by virtue of his death for sin, has the right to open the seals on the revelation of God’s salvation of his world and people (Rv 5:9–10). Moreover, Jesus alone, by virtue of his resurrection that attests to the satisfaction of divine justice, guarantees the announcement of God’s victory over evil and God’s vindication of those for whom Jesus died.

The sixth objective

Gabriel informed Daniel that the seventy sevens would anoint the most holy one (either a place or a person). Given Daniel’s plea for the restoration of God’s desolate sanctuary (Dn 9:17), the sixth objective would seem to have a building and not a person in view. The Old Testament and intertestamental literature may never record the return of God’s glory to the second temple, but the Gospel of John does. John 1:14 says that the Word, earlier identified as God, took a human nature and lived on earth amongst us people. The Greek verb σκηνόω that is translated lived, more literally means ‘to live in a tent’. The nominal form of the verb, σκηνή [tent], is regularly used in the Septuagint for the Hebrew קֹדֶשׁ קָדָשִׁים [tabernacle]. John says that we have seen in Jesus the glory of the one and only (μονογενής) who has come from God. Moreover, John 2 records Jesus’ cleansing of the temple. When confronted by the Jews about his authority, Jesus said that he would destroy the temple and raise it in three days (Jn 2:19). John adds that Jesus had the temple of his body in mind, not Herod’s temple. The first two chapters of John, then, associate Jesus with the tabernacle and temple. The glory of God returned to take up residence not in the שְׁכָנָה מִשְׁכָּן [Most Holy Place] of Herod’s temple but in a new שְׁכָנָה מִשְׁכָּן, viz., Jesus’ body (cf. Meadowcroft 2001:448; Spatala 1997:294).

As Immanuel, which means God with us (Mt 1:23), Jesus is Daniel’s anointed שְׁכָנָה מִשְׁכָּן and Ezekiel’s new temple (cf. Gruenthaner 1939:47–48).
The parallels between Ezekiel 40–48 and Jesus continue in John. In John 4, Jesus meets a Samaritan woman at a well and strikes up a conversation with her by asking for a drink. Astonished that a Jewish man would pay attention to her, she asks why he is talking to her. Jesus responds by saying that she, if she knew who he was, would ask him for a drink and would receive living water. Confused and even offended, she asks how Jesus can give her water. Jesus says that his water relieves thirst forever and produces a spring of eternal life within those who drink it. If John has already identified Jesus as the new temple, this conversation with the Samaritan woman further establishes him as the source of the river of God’s redeeming grace that flows from Ezekiel’s new temple (cf. Spatafora 1997:114). Jesus will do no less than transform creation, not by literally desalinating the Dead Sea but by reversing the curse and restoring paradise. Moreover, the river of God’s grace that runs from Jesus into the woman makes her a temple of the Holy Spirit. The glory of God now dwells in her, and she, in Christ, becomes Ezekiel’s new temple and Daniel’s קֹדֶשׁ קָדָשִׁים. All who believe in Jesus, not just the Samaritan woman, drink of his river and become temples of the Spirit of Jesus (Jn 7:37–39; 1 Cor 3:16; Eph 2:22; 1 Pt 2:5).

Revelation 21:22 goes so far as to say that no temple is in the New Jerusalem. This observation might initially seem to contradict Daniel and Ezekiel, but not really. Ezekiel 48 expands the Most Holy Place to include the new city (cf. Briggs 1999:104–108, 221–223; Mathewson 2003:111–115, 223–224). John recognised this truth and combined it with his belief that the glory of God took up residence in Jesus. Jesus and those who believe in him become the most holy one. For this reason, Revelation 21:18 reports that the New Jerusalem is made of pure gold. Gold in the city recalls the gold interior of Solomon’s temple (1 Ki 6:21–22; 2 Chr 3:4–9). The whole city becomes a קֹדֶשׁ קָדָשִׁים (cf. Beale 2011:553554, 640; Mathewson 2003:133–154). No temple is necessary because God through Jesus resides without impediment in the midst of his people (cf. Spatafora 1997:237, 239). They are the temple that has become a people in an unbounded place (i.e. everywhere) rather than a circumscribed place amongst a multitude of people (Gundry 1987:254–264).

The writer of Daniel may not have been able to make all of these connections, and one wonders how much the writer of 1 Enoch 24–36 understood of his geographical discussion of radiating righteousness. In fact, 1 Peter 1:10–12 says that the prophets of the Old Testament struggled to understand what they were saying, but under the direction of the Holy Spirit, wrote better than they knew. With the benefit of Jesus’ teaching in Luke 24, the apostles could say that what the prophets had announced was being realised in Jesus. Jesus is the new temple, the Holy of Holies, Immanuel, and the glory of God. He puts an end to sin by atoning for it. He establishes righteousness in his people and throughout the world by imputing his righteousness to his people and satisfying the justice of God by his vicarious death for the sins of his people. Moreover, his Spirit conforms his people to his likeness. He restores communion between God and his creation. In sum, Jesus can be viewed as the answer to Daniel’s prayer for the mercy and glory of God. He accomplishes the six objectives of the seventy sevens and thereby ushers in the Jubilee of Jubilees.

The six objectives and New Testament eschatology

Gabriel informed Daniel that the objectives of the six infinitives would take seventy sevens to reach realisation. Whether seventy sevens are understood more literally as 490 years or more symbolically as ten jubilee cycles, no interpretive approach can escape the reality that arguably five of the six objectives have yet to achieve complete fulfilment. The one exception is the third objective. Jesus has already made the final and definitive sacrifice for sin. His atoning death paid the penalty for the sins of his people, regardless of their place in history. Jesus died once for all (Heb 9:12, 24–28). That the Holy Spirit applies the benefits of Jesus’ work down through history to individual believers so as to regenerate and sanctify them does not detract from Jesus’ affirmation on the cross, ‘It is finished’. The on-going ministry of the Holy Spirit, both before the cross and after, is made possible by the finished work of Jesus.

As for the other objectives in Daniel 9:24, they have an ‘already-not yet’ quality to them. Regarding the first two objectives, neither the Maccabean crisis nor the first coming of Jesus put an end to sin (cf. Kaiser 2011:105–106; Robertson 2004:343; Wright 1996:659). People, whether Christian or not, still sin by breaking the Ten Commandments. Even Paul, who told the Romans that sin would no longer master them (Rm 6:14), admitted that he did not always do the good that he wanted or avoid the evil that he loathed (Rm 7:19). Moreover, Paul had to reprimand Peter for reverting to his former Jewish exclusivism and shunning Gentile Christians out of fear of a small group of Judaisers (Gl 2:11–14). The apostles did not achieve perfection in this life, and neither does anyone else. Since Daniel received a visit from Gabriel, the human race in general and God’s people in particular persist in failing to love one another in thought, word, and deed. Children still disobey and dishonour their parents. Couples still cheat on one another and steal from someone else what is not theirs by right of marriage. People still misrepresent the truth to protect themselves or to gain some advantage. God’s world has not yet been fully reconciled to his eternal plan, and evidence abounds that the world is not yet the way it is supposed to be. It still labours under the effects of the fall and the curse in Genesis 3.

The presence of sin in the world, of course, means that the fourth objective (everlasting righteousness) awaits full realisation. As Jeremiah’s righteous king, the sinless Jesus may impute his righteousness to those who trust in him for justification, but every Christian’s experience lags behind his or her position. Paul remarkably claims that Christians are now seated with Christ in the heavenly realms (Eph 2:6), but the same letter tells its recipients to eliminate all bitterness, rage, anger, brawling, and slander (Eph 4:31). The imperative would not be necessary if none of this unrighteous behaviour existed amongst the Ephesian Christians.

As for the fifth and sixth objectives, they, too, await complete fulfilment. Not all prophecy has yet come to pass – the fifth objective. For example Isaiah’s expectation of a new heaven and earth, purged of the effects of the curse, is not yet a reality, nor are the prophetic threats against the enemies of God and his people. Jesus, for example stopped short of saying that the day of vengeance in Isaiah 61:2 found fulfilment today in the Nazareth synagogue (Luke 4:19). Instead, he mentioned a future time when he would come in glory to judge the sheep and the goats (Mt 25:31–46). Referring to the same event, Paul said that Jesus would inflict vengeance on those who neither know God nor obey the gospel (2 Th 1:8). If anointing the ŝĕḇĕr šĕḇĕr, the sixth objective, involves expanding the perimeter of the Most Holy Place so that it fills the earth, then God’s creation has yet to become a sanctuary of pure worship. From a biblical point of view, much false and abominable worship still occurs in God’s world. Moreover, those who believe in Jesus may be temples of the Holy Spirit, but the Corinthian Christians to whom Paul first applied the description kept him busy with pastoral care. Similarly, church history up to the present offers a steady stream of unchristian conduct.

So then, what the prophets in general expected after the exile and what Gabriel in particular announced for the seventy sevens has progressively but partially materialised in history. Some difference, though, exists between the future outlook of the prophets (including Daniel) on the one hand, and the New Testament on the other (cf. Beale 2011:161–162; Hoekema 1979:12–22). The prophets looked ahead to one coming of God that would set matters right in a fallen world. God would judge the wicked and vindicate the righteous. He would save his people from their sins and restore his creation (though the sevens are no longer counting down). From 539 BCE to the present, God’s people have been united by their experience of tension between what God has promised and what God has so far done. If the prophecy of seventy sevens is read with this tension in mind, then one can learn from the major approaches and yet recognise that none has adequately explained the tension.

Meanwhile, the New Testament emphasises the tension by referring to followers of Jesus as aliens and strangers in this present evil age (1 Pt 2:11). Like the Israelites in Egypt, in Babylon, and under the rule of Antiochus IV and Hellenised Jews, Christians await the Jubilee of Jubilees. They may have experienced a foretaste of jubilee by means of what Jesus accomplished at his first coming, but the fullness of jubilee (i.e. the complete enjoyment of the six objectives of Daniel 9:24) remains a future event for which Christians wait with longing as well as joy (1 Pt 1:6–9). Whilst one could read Daniel 9:24–27 with cynicism and say that jubilee never came in the second century and has not come since, Antiochus IV did die and so also did the Hasmonene rulers. Moreover, none of them came back to life. By contrast, Jesus demonstrated righteousness in life and then willingly laid down his righteous life as an atoning sacrifice for sin. As proof of God’s satisfaction with his redemptive work, Jesus rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and promised to return in majesty. Not to be missed is the exceptional integrity of Jesus. Jesus, according to the New Testament, is an anointed one who exercises the offices of king and priest by conquering evil through personal sacrifice. Antiochus IV and the Hasmonean rulers knew nothing of such unselfish ministry for others. Neither have most other political leaders.

Summary
This article has focused on what Daniel 9:24–27 means in the New Testament period and beyond. It is true that the New Testament never explicitly cites Daniel 9:24. Still, Jesus is another anointed one and the final Anointed One. The New Testament considers the death of Jesus the definitive solution to sin (the first three objectives). Jesus makes believers in him righteous so that they can act righteously (the fourth objective). He fulfills prophecy (the fifth objective) by bringing redemptive history to its goal, which is its exaltation through the salvation of his people. Moreover, he, as Immanuel (God with us), is the Holy of Holies that sanctifies the whole world (the sixth objective). By finishing the accomplishment of the six objectives of the seventy sevens, Jesus brings the fullness of jubilee.
